fishing license, or whether they want to get...or whether they want their voter registration kept private, or any number of reasons. Well, finally, a couple of years back we discovered that Washington State had found rather a neat solution to all of this, and that is that they would allow a person to go to the Secretary of State's Office and to file with the Secretary of State and to ask that all of their mail and all of their addresses be routed through the Secretary of State's Office, and they would use the Secretary of State's post office box on all the official public records. Well, let me go through this bill section by section and tell you how it works. The Government Committee actually sent this bill to the floor last year as its priority bill. And I might say that we worked on it for awhile. Senator Bruning, then Senator Bruning, had a bill and I had introduced a bill and we melded the two. It sat out on General File last year and never got discussed by this body. And part of the problem was at the time it had a 40,000, 40-some thousand dollar fiscal note on it. And, as you all know, we weren't too wild about any kind of a bill with a fiscal note on it. So over the summer, the staff from the Government Committee and I worked with some different groups and with the Secretary of State's Office to figure out how we could do this that wouldn't have a fiscal impact. And, finally, we decided that if we took the training portion out of the bill, which would have been the part where the Secretary of State trained agencies and individuals and groups how to use this bill, that they wouldn't have to have a real highly skilled employee, that they could have a clerical person, probably part time, and they could cut that down to about $20,000. And if we did that, then they could use their...one of their funds, cash funds, to actually underwrite this person. So with that explanation, let me tell you a little bit about what the bill does. It defines abuse and all of those kinds of things, sets up definitions. And in Section 5, it says if the participant obtains a...I am sorry, in Section 4 it says: Upon a properly completed application, the Secretary of State shall certify the applicant for four years unless the certification is withdrawn or invalidated. The Secretary of State will establish a renewal procedure. A person who provides false information on the application will be criminally punished. Section 5 of the bill says that if the participant obtains a name change, the certification is forfeited unless the
